Introduction

In the contemporary world of technology, social networking has risen rapidly in the last decades. Today, communities are dispersed unlike in the past; thus, the need for advanced methods of networking and communication. Social networking sites are online platforms, which allow users to create semi-social profiles, where they can interact with friends and people with common interests. They bridge gaps created by communication barriers, distance, and accessibility. Notably, social networking affects individuals differently either positively or negatively. Despite the fact that SNSs provide people with business opportunities, connect friends, promote empathy, and allow quick communication, they cause addiction, cyberbullying, and loss of privacy.

Social Networking Sites and Increased Communication

Social networking sites have increased communications in the twenty-first century. The most popular sites include Facebook, YouTube, Snapchat, Twitter, and LinkedIn. They enable people with the same interests to create connections that are not possible offline. Additionally, the sites are useful for business operations, such as advertisement and product awareness. In the past, information was passed through televisions and magazines alone. Only those with an outgoing character were able to connect with people in social gatherings, such as parties. On the other hand, introverts and shy individuals remained dull with a small circle of friends or none at all. Notably, mobile phones helped enhance the connection to a small extent. However, the emergence of social media platforms transformed the whole idea of friendship.

Secondly, SNSs help develop empathy. Many of the social platforms such as Twitter and Facebook allow people to share their life stories, daily activities, feelings, and the difficulties of life with people who care for them. Online friends care and will probably react to such stories with various emotions (Kaplan et al. 63). Individuals receive the feedback warmly, which motivates them since they feel loved. Moreover, friends will listen to personal accounts-good or bad-and offer the necessary advice
