

Nonprofit Communications

Without a Content Strategy	With a Content Strategy
You publish a random collection of articles and other pieces of content.	Each piece you create fits into the larger story you are telling.
You focus on your org's goals, like fundraising, participation rates, and reporting on activities.	You focus on supporters' and participants' goals, like having fun, being a better person, and beating the bad guys.
You write about your expert staff.	You share your expertise.
The first (I, Our) or third person (The nonprofit, it) dominates your writing.	The second person (you, your) dominates your writing.
You feel like a salesperson as you write.	You feel like a journalist as you write.
You make your readers feel suspicious and annoyed.	You make your readers smarter and happier.
Readers may think of you as an intruder, or someone who interrupts all the time.	Readers will think of you as an invited guest who seems to know just what they wanted and what to say.
Your website, newsletter, and social channels are all managed separately.	You tailor and repurpose content for different channels, but the core message is the same.
Marketing, fundraising and program staff only talk to each other when they need something from someone.	Marketing, fundraising, and program staff work together constantly.
You leave people hanging.	You suggest next steps or opportunities.
You make it all up as you go.	Your work is planned, but with built-in flexibility to adjust as needed.
Your communications are unpredictable.	Your communications are consistent, like a promise made and kept.
You create long, tedious to-do lists.	You create results.
