

Wireless mic WMIC1 User Guide

GENERAL INFORMATION

Thank you for purchasing the Dukane Wireless Microphone System WMIC1. This system operates using digital voice coding which is transmitted by radio frequency signal at 2.4GHz.

The system consists of a small lightweight transmitter into which a headset, lapel or other mic can be plugged. The transmitter unit has a lanyard or cord so it can be worn around the user's neck.

The wireless radio frequency, RF, signal is sent to a receiver unit that can be placed somewhere in the room. The receiver is typically near a audio amplifier. Or the receiver can be placed on or near a projector which has a "mic input". The projector can then amplify the signal for it's internal speakers. Inside the projector the signal can also be switched and mixed with other audio inputs. Furthermore the projector can control the volume level and the signal can be obtained from the audio output for use with external amplifiers and speakers.

The range for the mic transmitter is about 100 feet. The system can operate on any of 80 selectable channel frequencies. The channel is set by the receiver and visible on the LED numeric display of the receiver. The channels range is from 2.400 to 2.480 GHz starting with 2.401 and increasing in 0.001 steps to 2.480 GHz.

Upon initial operation the transmitter is paired to the preset receiver channel by bringing the mic transmitter within about 6 ft. of the receiver. Once paired the system can operate at the full range. Due to the many channels available, other identical mic systems paired to a different channel can operate in close proximity.

The transmitter has a red LED to indicate low battery charge, and a green LED to indicate the "paired to receiver" status. A flashing green LED on the transmitter or receiver means the system is "seeking a device" for pairing.
