

Slaves were brought to America from Africa via European ships and were treated like property and sold as such. African Americans have been involved in a struggle for rights since 1783, when a move was made by abolitionist to eradicate slavery and put an end to the slave trade. Although slavery was abolished some time ago, there is great controversy over whether or not the descendants of American slaves should receive reparations. Many proponents, including Bittker (2007), feel very strongly that reparations should be paid and have presented a strong case along those lines.

African Americans toiled as slaves for over two centuries. Their labor was free, as they were not paid for their work. They were forcefully taken from their countries and made to live in a strange land under the total control of their white masters. They were estranged from their familiar culture and society. This is just one reason why African American descendants should be paid reparations.

Slaves were endlessly tortured, and this did not end with slavery. African Americans were subjected to unjust imprisonment, extreme violence, branding and many were killed. White slave owners were often responsible for the violence against, and murders of, African American men. Once freed, African Americans were also unfairly treated and some believe they are still targeted by white authorities.

African American women were treated cruelly as slaves. They were used for breeding purposes and had to be made available for the whims of their white slave masters. Rapes against them conducted by white slave owners were rampant and many children resulted from these forced dalliances.

Reparations are necessary because of the stereotypes that have resulted from African American slavery. From the beginning of the slave trade, African American slaves were ridiculed while they were being captured, transported, inspected and sold. Their physical characteristics were highlighted as a point of entertainment. The entire race has been made to feel inferior and their traditions and religions have been subjected to extreme criticism.

Millions of African Americans were enslaved to increase the wealth of the world's richest nations. The Dutch, Irish, British, Spaniards and other Europeans highly benefited from the vileness that was the slave trade. All of these countries condoned and encouraged the use of African slaves, especially in the colonies that were established in the Americas. As for America itself, even after the abolitionist movement began, the southern states refused to
