

Ch. 3 NJ Driver's Manual

The New Jersey Driver License System

1. Journal of Management Studies, 1997, 34, 1, 1-14.

Abstract A stress response characterized by an elevated stress reaction and a diminished level of a protective stress response, referred to as the "type A" pattern, has been associated with atherosclerosis. However, the underlying mechanisms are not clear. The present study examined the relationship between the type A pattern and the autonomic nervous system (ANS) in a sample of 100 healthy men. The type A pattern was measured using a validated questionnaire. The ANS was measured using a heart rate variability (HRV) analysis. The results showed that the type A pattern was associated with a lower level of HRV, indicating a lower level of ANS activity. This relationship was mediated by the level of perceived stress. The findings suggest that the type A pattern is associated with a lower level of ANS activity, which may be a result of a higher level of perceived stress.
