Input

- Input is any information that is needed by your program to complete its execution.
- Some programs use graphical components like a popup dialog box to accept and return the character string that is typed by the user.
- You are certainly familiar with programs that are controlled simply by clicking the mouse in a specific area of the screen. Still other programs, like word processing programs, get some of their input from a file that is stored on the computer's floppy or hard disk drive.
- Some programs, like web browsers, get their data from a network connection, while others get data from devices like scanners, digital cameras and microphones.

The possibilities are limited only by computer scientists' imagination.

Output

- Output is any information that the program must convey to the user.
- The information you see on your computer screen is being output by one or more programs that are currently running on your computer.
- When you decide to print a document, a program is told to send some output to the printer.
- Any sound that your computer makes is because some program sent output to the speakers on your computer.
- The possibilities for program output are also limited only by our imaginations.
