The Story of the Last Days of Jerusalem Alfred John Church, 2018-10-30 IN this story I have followed the narrative of Josephus making many omissions but no other change of importance It did not fall within the scope of my work to estimate his veracity and trustworthiness but I may here say that a close acquaintance with his history will not incline the reader to put much confidence in his narrative on any point where interest or vanity may have tempted him to depart from the truth In one matter which is of such interest and importance that an account of it may be given here he seems to have deliberately falsified history The ingenuity of a German critic Jacob von Bernays detected in the Chronicle of Sulpicius Severus a Christian writer A D 350 420 a very slightly disguised quotation from one of the lost books of the History of Tacitus The passage may be thus translated Titus is said to have called a council of war and then put to it the question whether he ought to destroy so grand a structure as the Temple Some thought that a sacred building more famous than any that stood upon the earth ought not to be destroyed If it were preserved it would be a proof of Roman moderation if destroyed it would brand the Empire for ever with the stigma of cruelty On the other hand there were some and among these Titus himself who considered that the destruction of the Temple was an absolute necessity if there was to be a complete eradication of the Jewish and Christian religions These superstitions opposed as they were to each other had sprung from the same origin the Christians had come forth from among the Jews remove the root and the stem would speedily perish In the interest doubtless of his Imperial patrons the family of Vespasian Josephus represents the destruction of the Temple as
