5 pages | 1212 words

Nurse practitioners have been working in primary care delivering care to patients in multiple settings due to a significant reduction of physicians and increased number of people with complicated health conditions (Ramira, Peraza-Smith, McLeod, & Clarke, 2018). In order to be considered a nurse practitioner, a nurse must complete a Masters in Nursing with a specialty in nurse practitioner, pass a licensing examination, and become registered. Nurse practitioners treat patients from a holistic nursing perspective and have the autonomy to diagnose and treat acute and chronic health conditions (Sangster-Gormley, Griffith, Schreiber, Borycki, Feddema, & Thompson, 2015). With this shortage of physicians, more nurse practitioners are needed to practice in primary health settings. Traditionally, nurse practitioners have been advocates of preventative and primary healthcare. As the demand for patient care continues to grow, it is expected to become greater than the supply (Ramira et al., 2018). Through inter-professional collaboration nurse practitioners work with healthcare teams increasing patient access to safe, proficient care and filling the gaps in the healthcare system (Sangster-Gormley et al., 2015). Family nurse practitioners working as primary care providers benefit the healthcare community by not only solving the primary care physician shortage but also by improving the quality of care a patient receives (Ramira et al., 2018).

Clinical or Non-Clinical

A family nurse practitioner works in a clinical role. Nurse practitioners see patients in multiple settings including urgent care centers, hospitals, physician's offices, and emergency rooms. Patients have reported greater clinical respect for nurses who have advanced their roles compared to other healthcare professionals. Students who finish school and work as family nurse practitioners report more autonomy in practicing patient care, greater knowledge of clinical skills, greater confidence in clinical practice, and more opportunities for professional growth (Ramira et al., 2018).

Advanced Nursing Practice Concept

The seven core competencies of advanced practice nursing include: direct clinical practice, guidance and coaching, consultation, evidence-based practice, leadership, collaboration, and ethical decision making (Hamric, 2014). As a recent graduate as a nurse practitioner, the first year post graduation is a time of transition. The nurse practitioner will need mentoring and support. Some physicians expect nurse practitioners to assume responsibility and manage their own practice independently. This prospect could be practical if the nurse practitioner has clinical experience; however, if it is a newly graduated nurse practitioner, this expectation could be problematic. Nurse practitioners are hired into a position as a team member. The physician on that team should understand prior to hiring the newly graduated nurse practitioner that he or she will be acting as a mentor and providing support. The structure of the physician-nurse practitioner relationship influences how a nurse practitioner adapts to the new role, so before hiring a newly graduated nurse practitioner, a physician should accept the role of mentor (Sangster-Gormley et al., 2015). Nurse practitioners will then be able to provide expert guidance and coaching for patients and family transitioning through health and illnesses because of their direct practice guidance and understanding (Hamric, 2014).
