It is problematic to compare results across studies and have a view of the appropriateness of theoretical and statistical modelling skills and results, without the ability to be explicit in specifying what data representation and analysis has been utilized. I think that it is an essential part of a graduate program to have a good understanding of the theoretical and statistical issues that are involved in the analysis of data. For these challenges, researchers, educators, and the public, I will be able to apply the skills I've developed in my previous studies to anticipate and respond to the challenges. The research I've done provides an opportunity for independent research, learning from a variety of sources, which will allow me to develop a strong and confident research approach, and the specific knowledge and experience I've gained in the classroom will allow me to apply that knowledge to the challenges I face. There is no charge to participate in the program or community, and a choice for small groups offers opportunities for personalization. L&L's 1999-2000 Learning Program included eight facilitated small groups that met biweekly for 12 weeks and included three sessions that provided information about the particular field of education to identify relevant and appropriate skills and career, and a final facilitated session that was held at a local university where several different fields were represented.
