Guide to Plant Spores Florence J Martin, 2020-08-21 Spore a reproductive cell capable of developing into a new individual without fusion with another reproductive cell Spores thus differ from gametes which are reproductive cells that must fuse in pairs in order to give rise to a new individual Spores are agents of asexual reproduction whereas gametes are agents of sexual reproduction Spores are produced by bacteria fungi algae and plants Bacterial spores serve largely as a resting or dormant stage in the bacterial life cycle helping to preserve the bacterium through periods of unfavourable conditions Spore production is particularly common among Bacillus and Clostridium bacteria several species of which are disease causing Many bacterial spores are highly durable and can germinate even after years of dormancy Bacillus megaterium an endospore forming bacterium The nearly mature spore is visible within the mother cell magnified about 17 000 times Among the fungi spores serve a function analogous to that of seeds in plants Produced and released by specialized fruiting bodies such as the edible portion of the familiar mushrooms fungal spores germinate and grow into new individuals under suitable conditions of moisture temperature and food availability Many larger algae reproduce by spores and are also capable of sexual reproduction A number of red algae species produce monospores walled nonflagellate spherical cells that are carried by water currents and form a new organism upon germination Some green algae produce nonmotile spores called aplanospores whereas others produce motile zoospores which lack true cell walls and bear one or more flagella The flagella allow zoospores to swim to a favourable environment in which to develop whereas monospores and aplanospores must rely on passive transport by water currents Among plants all of which have a life cycle characterized by alternating generations of asexually and sexually reproducing individuals spores are the reproductive agents of the asexual generation Produced by the sporophyte i e spore bearing generation plant spores give rise to the haploid gametophyte i e gamete bearing generation Spores are most conspicuous in the non seed bearing plants including liverworts hornworts mosses and ferns In these lower plants as in fungi the spores function much like seeds In general the parent plant sheds the spores locally the spore generating organs are frequently located on the undersides of leaves The spores of plants that inhabit the edges of bogs or lakes are frequently shed into the water or are carried there by rain and are preserved in the sediments Wind dispersal is a factor in plants that shed their spores explosively Among the seed bearing plants the gymnosperms and the angiosperms the haploid spores are far less conspicuous They are not released from the parent plant but rather they germinate into microscopic gametophyte individuals that are entirely dependent upon the diploid sporophyte plant Gymnosperms and angiosperms form two kinds of spores microspores which give rise to male gametophytes and megaspores which produce female gametophytes
