Conservation Refugees Mark Dowie, 2011-02-25 How native people from the Miwoks of Yosemite to the Maasai of eastern Africa have been displaced from their lands in the name of conservation Since 1900 more than 108 000 officially protected conservation areas have been established worldwide largely at the urging of five international conservation organizations About half of these areas were occupied or regularly used by indigenous peoples Millions who had been living sustainably on their land for generations were displaced in the interests of conservation In Conservation Refugees Mark Dowie tells this story This is a good guy vs good guy story Dowie writes the indigenous peoples movement and conservation organizations have a vital common goal to protect biological diversity and could work effectively and powerfully together to protect the planet and preserve biological diversity Yet for more than a hundred years these two forces have been at odds The result thousands of unmanageable protected areas and native peoples reduced to poaching and trespassing on their ancestral lands or assimilated but permanently indentured on the lowest rungs of the money economy Dowie begins with the story of Yosemite National Park which by the turn of the twentieth century established a template for bitter encounters between native peoples and conservation He then describes the experiences of other groups ranging from the Ogiek and Maasai of eastern Africa and the Pygmies of Central Africa to the Karen of Thailand and the Adevasis of India He also discusses such issues as differing definitions of nature and wilderness the influence of the BINGOs Big International NGOs including the Worldwide Fund for Nature Conservation International and The Nature Conservancy the need for Western scientists to respect and honor traditional lifeways and the need for native peoples to blend their traditional knowledge with the knowledge of modern ecology When conservationists and native peoples acknowledge the interdependence of biodiversity conservation and cultural survival Dowie writes they can together create a new and much more effective paradigm for conservation

Complex Art Conservation and Preservation

Problems Paul-Bernhard Eipper,2023-09-13 In this book for the first time an examination of Egon Schiele s general painting technique is carried out The main case study for this comprehensive investigation is the painting Stadtende H userbogen III 1918 one of Egon Schiele s last works which is housed at Universalmuseum Joanneum Graz Austria In this book the conservation campaign is detailed uncovering portrait sketches integrated and painted over in the painting unmasking the signature as a forgery and recognising the frame as the original decorative frame The research in the years following the conservation is detailed discussing that among other pigments cadmium sulphide was confirmed in the paint material which will influence subsequent conservation measures for the painting The book s examination continues with the complex interactions between environment and object that were also addressed in recently completed EU projects concluding that continuously gained knowledge about external influences and storage materials used will help to adapt further measures to the painting as it continues to degrade
