

INTERNAL VALIDITY

- ✦ An experiment is internally valid when the effects on the DV are due to the IV solely & effects of an extraneous variable have not been mistaken for the effects of the IV.
- ✦ An internally valid experiment is free of confounding.

To ensure validity, be sure that:

- ✦ Your procedures incorporate appropriate methodology and control techniques.
- ✦ You have included enough levels of the IV to make an adequate test of your hypothesis and try to anticipate any potential confounding variables.
- ✦ Use standard techniques like random assignment, consistency of conditions, and counterbalancing throughout your research.

Manipulation check - evaluates how well the experimenter manipulated the experimental situation he/she intended to produce.

- ✦ Determine whether subjects followed directions & were appropriately affected by the treatments.

Fact of ignorance between subjects & experimenter (Orne, 1969)

Subjects expect their data to be discarded if they guess the experimental hypothesis so if you ask them what they understood about the purpose of the experiment, they will not reveal this info to the experimenter.

- ✦ Note: Deflect, to counter this, subjects need to believe that you really want a truthful answer.

Experimenters don't want to test additional subjects & may take subject reports at face value instead of requesting additional info; might not really press subjects for much information because it could mean that some data may not be usable.

- ✦ Note: when you interpret, always be open to other potential explanations for your findings.
- ✦ Beginning researchers often spend too much time listing everything imaginable that could have influenced any of the subjects' responses.
- ✦ Students often spend too little time thinking about other potential explanations for their results.

STATISTICAL CONCLUSION VALIDITY

- ✦ Validity of drawing conclusions about a treatment effect from the statistical results that were obtained.

Which mistakes could produce this threat to internal validity?

1. Assumptions of a statistical test are violated.
2. Selecting the wrong statistical test - using a t-test/ANOVA to analyze ordinal data.
3. Improperly using a statistical test - calculating multiple t-tests.
4. Drawing the wrong conclusions from the test - reporting  $p = .07$  as a trend.

PROBLEM OF EXTERNAL VALIDITY

External validity - an experiment is externally valid when its findings can be extended to other situations & populations.

Externally valid study meets 2 requirements:

1. Experiment must be internally valid
2. Experimental findings can be replicated

GENERALIZING FROM RESULTS

- ✦ Instead of speaking of a particular sample (for example, 30 female undergraduates) and a specific set of operational definitions (for example, scores on the Manifest Anxiety Scale), we draw broader inferences from the findings through inductive thinking.
- ✦ Valid experimental findings appear again and again.

GENERALIZING ACROSS SUBJECTS

Problems that prevent us from generalizing across subjects:

1. The samples used in psychological research are often biased & may not represent the larger population.
2. The samples may not always represent even college psychopops since we heavily depend on volunteers. Note: volunteers can be quite different from non-volunteers.
3. When we have trouble finding subjects, we will also have trouble getting samples that are typical of the population we are trying to study.

GENERALIZING FROM PROCEDURES TO CONCEPTS

- ✦ Experimental variables like anger may have multiple operational definitions.
- ✦ When we generalize from our experimental results, we move from discussing our specific operational definition of a concept to discussing the concept itself.

Why is this a problem in research?

- ✦ It's dangerous to generalize from a single experiment's operational definition of anger.
- ✦ We can't be sure of the reliability or validity of our procedures.

Ex: is your definition of learning tapping into the same phenomenon tested by others in prior research.

- ✦ As we formulate general conclusions, we move further away from the actual observations that we made.

Research significance

- ✦ A study achieves research significance when its findings clarify or extend knowledge gained from previous studies & raise implications for broader theoretical issues.

When should we question novel findings?

- ✦ We should question novel findings when they contradict prior findings that have been successfully replicated.
- ✦ The burden of proof is on the experimenter who claims novel findings to explain this discrepancy.
