

Making fire in the wild means rediscovering some very ancient survival skills.

Making Fire

Fire is extremely important to survival. It is a great morale booster, keeps you warm, dries your clothes, boils water, and can be used for signaling and for cooking food. It is imperative that you know how to build, start, and maintain a fire.

MAKING FIRE

The materials for a fire fall into three categories: tinder, kindling, and fuel. Tinder is any type of material that has a low flash point and is easily ignited. It usually consists of thin, bone-dry fibers. Tinder includes shredded bark from some trees and bushes; crushed fibers from dead plants; fine, dry wood shavings, straw and grasses; resinous sawdust; very fine pitch wood shavings; bird or rodent nest linings; seed down; charred cloth; cotton balls or lint; steel wool; dry powdered sap from pine trees; paper; and foam rubber.

Get into the habit of always having tinder with you, and remember to carry it in a waterproof container.

Kindling has a higher combustible point and is added to the tinder. It is used to bring the burning

Left: Survival firemaking is not just about creating flames from techniques such as the bow-drill method (top). It is also about creating the right type of fire for your purposes, and keeping that fire going under poor conditions.
