

WRITING PERSONAL STATEMENTS FOR COLLEGE, GRAD SCHOOL, AND SCHOLARSHIPS

Writing Personal Statements

Writing a good personal statement is challenging, but it's incredibly important. Usually, you have 500 words or less to convince a selection committee that you're eager, driven, exceptional, curious, creative, resilient, capable, and aware of the challenges that await you. Your personal statement helps the selection committee understand who you are as a person and what you'll bring to their program.

When selection committees sit down to look at applications, they don't read lots of them out. The few that run in may reject students' key applications that are incomplete, that don't have the right test scores, and/or that have questionable letters. They also read our personal statements that scored the worst (and/or that do not directly address the questions on the application). You want to have a kind of "best case standing" overall on your application. You want to answer all of the selection committee's possible objections so that you make it to the final round.

Many schools post examples of good personal statements. Take the time to do a little research to see what the school tends to look for in a personal statement.

Keep in mind that when the economy is bad, programs are flooded with even more applicants, so you must prepare an even better personal statement under these circumstances.

Accepting a student into a program or awarding them a scholarship is a financial risk for the granting party. Programs are rated based on a number of factors. One factor is whether students they graduate in a given time period, how much money donors donate, and what type of work students do. They want to accept students who will graduate and then go on to be productive citizens.

You must demonstrate that you're a good risk. You do that by showing that you understand what it takes to finish the program and to succeed when you finish.

What You Need to Know for a Good Personal Statement

As you start thinking up your personal statement, you should:

- Develop a "hook"
- Follow the length and format requirements exactly
- Answer the writing prompt directly
- Detail exactly what they request
- Be honest
- Sound age appropriate
- Sound credible
- Demonstrate that you'll finish the program
