

The lac operon

Cyclic AMP (cAMP)

It can activate enzymes by binding away from the active site and this causes a change in the tertiary structure which will activate it. For example it may change the shape of the active site to make it complementary to the substrate. It is like the opposite of how a non-competitive inhibitor works.

Genetic Control of Protein Production

In the nucleus of every cell there will be the same chromosomes and DNA sequences. It would be pointless if all the genes on every chromosome were constantly turned on because every cell would be making every protein and it doesn't need to. This would waste energy and stop it from carrying out its function.

Genetic control of protein production is important in more complex organisms because it allows the cells to differentiate. For example an erythrocyte will have the gene for producing haemoglobin switched on. A beta cell will have the gene for producing insulin turned on.

E. coli lac operon

A lac operon is a length of DNA containing structural genes and control sites. In this example  $\beta$  galactoside permease gene and  $\beta$  galactosidase gene are the structural genes. This is one that codes for a protein, in particular an enzyme. The promoter and operator genes are control sites. The regulator gene is outside of the operon.

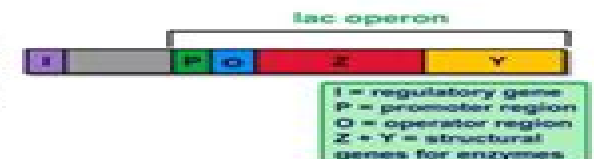

E. coli can metabolise the lactose. Bacteria synthesises the enzymes needed to metabolise the lactose only when lactose is present. So it only wants to switch on the genes coding for these enzymes when lactose is present.

Bacteria produce two enzymes to help it metabolise lactose. Lactose permease, which helps transport lactose across the membrane and into the cell and  $\beta$ -galactosidase, which hydrolyses and breaks down the lactose. It can then be used in respiration.

It would be a waste of time for the E. coli to make these two enzymes if there was no lactose present to make use of them. It uses the lac operon to control this. The genes coding for these enzymes are found in the lac operon.
