WebLogic Server Performance and Tuning

Tuning WebLogic Server

The following sections describe how to tune WebLogic Server to match your application needs.

- Setting Performance-Related config.xml Parameters
- Setting Performance-Related weblogic-ops.jar.xml Parameters
- Setting Java Parameters for Starting WebLogic Server
- Setting Your Java Compiler
- Using WebLogic Server Clusters
- Monitoring a WebLogic Server Domain

Setting Performance-Related config.xml Parameters

The WebLogic Server configuration file (`config.xml`) contains a number of performance-related parameters that can be fine-tuned depending on your environment and applications. The `config.xml` file, located on the machine that hosts the Administration Server, provides persistent storage of MBean attribute values. Every time you change an attribute using the system administration tools (using either the command-line interface or the Administration Console), its value is stored in the appropriate administration MBean and written to the `config.xml` file. Each WebLogic Server domain has its own `config.xml` file.

For more information about using WebLogic Server system administration tools, see the "System Administration Tools" section in the Administration Guide.

Table 3-1 lists the `config.xml` file parameters that affect server performance.

Table 3-1 Performance-Related config.xml Elements
