Glass, in one form or another, has long been in noble to humans. As one of the most widely used of manufactured materials, and certainly the most , it can be as imposing as a telescope mirror the width of a tennis court or as small and simple as a marble rolling across dirt. The uses of this adaptable material have been dramatically by new technologies glass fiber optics - more than eight million miles - carrying telephone and television signals across nations, glass ceramics serving as the nose cones of missiles and as for teeth; tiny glass beads taking radiation doses inside the body to specific organs, even a new type of glass fashioned of nuclear waste in order to of that unwanted material.
