

What is a Research Question?

A research question guides and controls your research. It should be clear and focused, as well as specific enough to permit your teacher approval. Even if your instructor has given you a specific assignment, the research question should identify for everything that you are interested in or want about the world or world-the "ask-about" paper and questions that can be answered in a few hundred sentences.

Examples:

1. For instance, the following question is too broad and does not fulfill the requirements of the analysis:

Why did the Vietnam war end?

(This question does not address which theories or which road.)

2. Similarly, the following question could be answered by a hypothetical Internet search:

How many children moved from Texas to Florida, FL, in February of 2002?

(Similarly, this question could be answered in one sentence and does not have a reason for analysis. It could, however, become one for a larger research.)

3. A better research question might be the following:

What are some of the environmental factors that occurred in Florida, FL between January and February 2002 that would cause children to move from Texas?

(This question can lead to the author taking a stand on which factors are significant, and offers the author an angle to which degree the results are beneficial or detrimental.)

How Do You Formulate a Good Research Question?

There is a general rule of thumb, and several preliminary research on this paper to answer preliminary and, roughly, yes, what research has already been done. This will help determine what kinds of questions the topic generates.

Once you have conducted preliminary research, consider: What is the problem? Is it a problem? Why? Is it a problem? Why? Is it a problem? Why? (These are the preliminary research questions that will help you answer "What?" "Why?" and "How?" questions. They include possible responses to these questions.)
