EARTHWORM DISSECTION STUDENT PAGE

Dissection safety:

- Treat all specimens with respect and appreciation.
- It is recommended to use gloves, an apron, and safety glasses or goggles while you dissect.
- Always cut towards your body. Always cut down, not towards the tray.
- Do not use dull or rusty dissection tools.
- Wash hands and clean your area after completing the dissection.

Background Information

Earthworms are classified as the phylum Annelida, which are the segmented worms. Each earthworm has about 100-150 segments, separated by septa. Each segment has structures that help the earthworm move and excrete, or transfer out the wastes of the body. These wastes help to excrete the wastes in the soil, making nutrient waste.

The earthworm's digestive system consists many sections, each with a specific function. These sections are designed to work together to digest the soil that the earthworm eats. Annelids are more complex than other worms because they have a 3-way digestive tract with a mouth at one end and an anus at the other.

The earthworm's blood is contained in blood vessels, which is known as a closed circulatory system. Its heart vessels are like a pump that pump blood throughout the body. There are 2 blood vessels dorsal and ventral that run the length of the worm, providing oxygen to all the cells in its body.

The earthworm's skin is its primary organ of respiration. It does not have lungs, but can diffuse its body in oxygen and remove carbon dioxide. Although it does have surface respiration like you and a tree, it does have the ability to absorb light. This allows the earthworm to stay in the dark, moist and where it can absorb oxygen, instead of breathing into the moist surface and drying out.

Earthworms are hermaphrodites, meaning that they each have male AND female sex organs. They still, however need a mate to reproduce. Two earthworms will line up and exchange sperm through copulations. The vitelline fluid forms a sticky tube. The earthworm slides out of the vitelline and as it slides off, it passes over the egg masses and they are fertilized by the newly collected sperm. The clutches eventually pass completely off the worm and form an egg mass that develops into worms.
