

PHYSICAL KINETIC MOLECULAR THEORY

Learning Objectives

- to identify theoretical differences in how heat conduction occurs in different types of materials and to understand the mechanism of the kinetic molecular theory
- to identify how temperature affects molecular motion
- to represent quantitative values using graphical representation of molecular motion

Module 1: Representation of states in different phases

The following figure illustrates the representation of particles in three different states of matter:

Understanding the differences in how heat conduction occurs in different states of matter is essential for understanding the kinetic molecular theory.

Key Concepts

- Effect of the type of material on the rate of heat conduction: The rate of heat conduction is affected by the type of material. The rate of heat conduction is highest in solids, followed by liquids, and lowest in gases. This is because the particles in solids are more closely packed and have more energy than the particles in liquids and gases.

Table 1: Effect of material on the rate of heat conduction

	Solid	Liquid	Gas
Rate of heat conduction	High	Medium	Low
Reason for high rate of heat conduction	The particles in solids are more closely packed and have more energy than the particles in liquids and gases. This allows the particles in solids to transfer heat more efficiently.	The particles in liquids are more closely packed than the particles in gases, but they have less energy than the particles in solids. This allows the particles in liquids to transfer heat more efficiently than the particles in gases.	The particles in gases are widely spaced and have less energy than the particles in liquids and solids. This allows the particles in gases to transfer heat less efficiently than the particles in liquids and solids.
