4 pages | 815 words

A frequent representation of females in literature is the role of the damsel in distress. Respond to this declaration by referring to the character of the landlady in the narrative of the exact same name. Females are frequently depicted as a damsel in distress in literature. This stereotype impacts our reading of Roald Dahl's narrative, The Landlady, and the response we have with its title character. Design, perspective and setting in addition to characterisation amalgamate in The Landlady to support this bias. The text introduces the Landlady as a lady of about forty-five to fifty years, with blue eyes and a round pink face. This description is friendly and reveals good sensation on Billy's part towards the Landlady. Billy's sees her as "... precisely like the mom of one's best school-friend ..." (pg. 5). This shows that Billy sees her as no hazard and trusts her fully, as she harmonizes the stereotype of a kindly older lady in requirement of business. He believes that she is lonesome and "a little dotty." Though this is not especially harsh, it reveals that he thinks the Landlady is a damsel in distress and for that reason treats her as such. A Bed and Breakfast in Bath is the home of the Landlady, and as it is her own domain, she is very much in control. Her lodging is portrayed in specific detail, and shows that she is really pleased with her house and is comfortable in her surroundings. She owns numerous high-ends, an intense fire, enjoyable furniture, piano, animals and plants. Although we see that the Landlady has the upper hand, we do not think she has any ill dream, as her home is so accommodating and her manner so friendly. We ignore the ideas prior to us, as the stereotyped view of her as a damsel in distress is so securely lodged in our minds. Third person limited point of view is used in the Landlady. This tells us the story from Billy's perspective and is consequently highly biased. He sees the Landlady as fragile, dotty and harmless, "...no question about that." (pg. 7). He sees her quirks and mannerisms as symptoms of her being a damsel in distress, needing his help to relieve her loneliness, not once thinking of the lengths she might go in order to gain his companionship. Billy thinks the Landlady is a damsel in distress as he makes an extra effort to be courteous and polite to her, wanting to help in anyway he can. The use of this point of view shows just how naive Billy is, and that he really does believe the Landlady to be a damsel in distress. The Landlady's dialogue puts us into a position which encourages our view of her as a damsel in distress. Her words are very soft and kind and there is no sense of hurry or menace in them. According to Billy, she is "terribly nice" and a "kind and generous soul". (pg. 7). He thinks of her as placid and passive, and since the text is in third person limited, we quickly assume this to be...
