Solid Ground Curing was developed and sold by Cubital Ltd. of Israel. While the method offered good accuracy and a very high fabrication rate, it suffered from high acquisition and operating costs due to system complexity. This led to poor market acceptance. While the company still exists, systems are no longer being sold. Nevertheless, it's still an interesting example of the many technologies other than stereolithography that utilize photopolymer materials.

The early versions of the system weighed several tons and required a sealed room. Size was made more manageable and the system sealed to prevent exposure to photopolymers, but it was still very large. (Please see the discussion on stereolithography for a description of photopolymers.)

Instead of using a laser to expose and harden photopolymer element by element within a layer as is done in stereolithography, SGC uses a mask to expose the entire object layer at once with a burst of intense UV light. The method of generating the masks is based on electrophotography (xerography).

This is a two cycle process having a mask generation cycle and a layer fabrication cycle. It takes about 2 minutes to complete all operations to make a layer:
