

Classical Conditioning

Classical conditioning is a kind of learning that had a main impact on behaviourism philosophy in psychology. It was discovered by the renowned physiologist from Russia, Ivan Pavlov. It is a learning process that happens through linkages between an environmental (external) stimulus and a normally happening stimulus (Hock, 2005). Besides the most essential component of the classical conditioning is the presence of a neutral stimulus in front of an innately happening reflex. Since he involved an external stimulus i.e., the food, only the sound of the bell tone was able to generate a conditioned response of salivation amongst dogs. The main principles of classical conditioning include the conditioned stimulus, the unconditioned stimulus, the conditioned signal and the conditioned response (Gross, 2008).

The unconditioned stimulus can be considered as the stimulus that naturally, unconditionally and in a reflex way activates a response. In the experiment conducted by Pavlov, the unconditioned stimulus is provided by the dog food, since it immediately triggers the salivation process, a natural outcome. The unconditioned response can be considered as a reaction that is innately processed and therefore happens naturally in the presence of an unconditional signal. In the experiment conducted by Pavlov, the salivation was an unconditioned reaction to food. The conditioned stimulus, on the other hand, is something that was independent of the unconditional reflex but as it has been associated with a natural unconditioned signal, it acquires the ability to generate the unconditioned response.
