

Although Stalin's role in creating the Soviet State was minor his role in establishing the U.S.S.R. as a nation was immense. Through a totalitarian approach Stalin controlled all aspects of life. He controlled the output of artists, collectivised the economy so it was state controlled, created a cult of personality around himself and used the Great Terror as a way to ensure he would have no opposition. It was in this way that Stalin remodelled the Soviet state successfully into a stronger nation where the state influenced all aspects of the economy, society and politics.

Stalin only played a minor role in the creation of the Soviet state. During Lenin's rule he was not seen as a man of action and generally concerned himself with administrative work. His first major work for Russia was the foundation of the official newspaper, Pravda. He then continued to assist implementing the Nomenklatura System where the General Secretary held a large amount of power by being the only person to be a part of the Politburo, Orgburo and Secretariat. Stalin recognised the control he could exercise on all parts of the party and became General Secretary in April 1922. Yet still Stalin did not make great changes to the State until he had complete control in 1928. Therefore, Stalin's role in the creation of the Soviet state was minor but after gaining control of the party he steered the U.S.S.R. into a new direction.

This new direction was Stalinism. Stalinism is a version of communist theory based on the policies of Joseph Stalin. The formation of this began in 1913 with Stalin's work concerning nationalities in a future communist state 'Marxism and the National Question', where he proclaimed the nation as a 'capitalist phenomenon'. Stalin believed in the theory of an aggravated class struggle he used this as a basis to suppress political opponents as victims of this struggle. In many ways it was synonymous with totalitarianism.

A prime concern of Stalinism was to establish Russia as a stable world power. According to Stalin, 'Other countries are 50 years ahead of Russia. We must make good this distance in 10 years'. The survival of Russia relied on the transformation into a modern society. All policies of Stalin and therefore the influence it had on life stemmed from this belief. The life of Russians changed dramatically due to the introduction of collectivisation and industrialisation, the use of a cultural revolution and the development of a climate of fear.

Collectivisation, introduced in 1928, was the policy that entailed all work must be to the benefit of the state. Primarily in agriculture, this led to amalgamation of private plots of lands, owned by the Kulak class, into government farms. This class of land owning peasants was eliminated in a process known as Dekulakisation. Individuals were indoctrinated to put the needs of the collective, state, over that of their own. This changed the culture of Russian society as bettering the state became a common goal of many. For example, the state procured grain from rural areas as it was needed in the cities to support industrialisation. Overall, this led to an increase in efficiency, which allowed people to move to cities yet agricultural production fell in the early 1930's by almost 40%. This policy, along the NKVD, the name of the Cheka from 1923, eliminated those with capitalist beliefs, the Kulaks. Although this supported industrialisation, there was also widespread famine in rural areas.

The second phase of this plan aimed to industrialise the country and create a command economy under the control of Gosplan, the state planning committee. Due to Stalin's belief in socialism in one country, the U.S.S.R. had to be self-sufficient. This was done through the implementation of Five Year Plans whose goals assisted the collective, not the individual. The First Five Year Plan, 1928-1932, focused on increasing efficiency of existing heavy industry. Although industrial output increased
