Background: Although the prevalence of depression in the United States is high, the majority of people with depression do not receive treatment. The purpose of this study was to determine the prevalence of depression in a community sample of older adults and to examine the association between depression and sociodemographic factors, health status, and access to care.

 2. Journal of the American Medical Association, 1997; 277: 1044-1048.

These authors also found that the use of a single, non-validated questionnaire to assess the prevalence of depression in the general population is not sufficient. They also found that the prevalence of depression was higher in the elderly population than in the younger population. This is consistent with the findings of the present study, which found that the prevalence of depression was higher in the elderly population than in the younger population.

These results suggest that the use of a single, standard, and simple questionnaire can be used to assess the prevalence of a wide range of mental health problems in a community sample. The questionnaire was found to be a valid and reliable measure of mental health problems, and the results suggest that it can be used to assess the prevalence of a wide range of mental health problems in a community sample. The questionnaire was found to be a valid and reliable measure of mental health problems, and the results suggest that it can be used to assess the prevalence of a wide range of mental health problems in a community sample.

These results indicate that the use of a single, non-validated questionnaire to assess the prevalence of mental health problems in the community is likely to be unreliable. The results also suggest that the prevalence of mental health problems in the community is likely to be higher than previously estimated.
